Digging pits

Scott Thiel, of Thiel Excavating and Drainage, uses a mini-excavator to dig pits for the District Soil Judging Contest on the Chuck and Norman Gottfried farm west of Wharton. Jordan Thiel (left) measured the pit depth and checked for existing drainage tile with a tile probe. Five pits were excavated for the contest with each pit being about 4 feet deep.

Evaluating a flood plain

Matt Bassler, of the Upper Sandusky Future Farmers of America, evaluates a flood plain soil pit during the District Soil Judging Contest. FFA students from several northwest Ohio high schools participated in the contest and results will be available next week. The soil pits allow students to look at the soil's profile in order to determine soil texture, soil structure and depth to high water table.

COLT Conference

Six members of the Mohawk Future Farmers of America, a satellite of Vanguard Sentinel Career Center, recently attended the COLT Conference. This conference was open for all members looking to become better leaders through various activities. The members who attended this activity included Erika Coldiron, Robert Gilliland, Ciara Long, Emily Daniel, Lindsay Daniel and Sarah Parker. The members had a great time listening to the speakers and interacting with other members from all around the state of Ohio. The members came back with new ideas on how to improve the chapter and the relationship with the community.
